AUTHOR'S PURPOSE NOTES

Which "slice" of is the author trying to share with you?

Persuade (influence):

The author tries to change the reader's opinion on a topic by appealing to his or her emotions. This form of writing is also called "encouraging" and "influencing" - as the reader is being swayed to one side or the other. Advertisements and flyers are a form of persuasive writing. When an author is trying to PERSUADE or INFLUENCE, he/she often includes his/her personal opinions within the piece of writing to get you to take action.

- Did the author try to convince me of something?
- Did the author want to change my opinion by giving me his/her opinion?

Persuade key verbs: convince, sway, influence, argue for or against.

Entertain:

Writing that TELLS A STORY (such as through the plot of fictional novel) or SIMPLY SHARES FEELINGS (like in a poem) is traditionally classified under the author's purpose of ENTERTAINING. Dialogue (or words spoken by one character to another - noted by the use of quotation marks) is often a key indicator that something was written simply to entertain. However, quotation marks don't ALWAYS pop up in stories that entertain, as they can be used for other purposes, such as quoting someone in a non-fiction ("informational") article.

- Did the author try to make me laugh?
- Did the author try to tell me a story?
- Did the author try to amuse me?

Inform:

The author tells the reader about something that the reader doesn't already know, providing new knowledge. If the author is explaining how a volcano works or what steps should be taken to bake/construct a wedding cake, then the reader is being informed. "Informational" texts are often filled with facts and figures.

- Did the author give me facts?
- Did the author try to teach me something?

Inform key verbs: show, teach, tell, instruct, report.

Entertain key verbs: amuse, make humorous, lighten up, teach a lesson.
